China - U.S. Symposium on Building the Financial System of the 21st Century
Will Financial Integration Continue to Grow?

• Mutual benefits of financial integration
  – Capital flows, and transnational listings strong and growing
  – Complementary characteristics – more stable returns for Chinese savers, lower interest rates for US borrowers
  – Foreign FIs help to improve Chinese financial markets and intermediation – e.g. promoting fundamental investing and risk management tools

• Chinese financial liberalization and openness
  – Liberalization and opening have proceeded despite political tensions

• Strategic competition and political headwinds
  – Rising rhetoric in US of new Cold War, “wolf warrior diplomacy” in China
  – Growing strategic flashpoints: South China Sea, Hong Kong
  – Growing technonationalism: IPR concerns, entity restrictions, AI competition, possible conflict over tech standards

• Can financial integration continue despite strategic tensions and calls for decoupling?
US Political Landscape

- Growing distrust of China
  - Resentments over COVID-19 common in political discourse
  - Both popular and elite levels
  - Increasingly comprehensive – economy, security, technology & IP

- Presidential election
  - Both Trump and Biden teams share strategic and tech concerns about China
  - Biden may be more likely to use multilateral mechanisms, search for areas of win-win (e.g., finance, climate change)
  - Coming months could bring strong actions against China, regardless of election

- Congress
  - Considerable distrust of China, reflected in bills about delisting, trade
  - Unlikely to be changed by election

- Financial institutions
  - US FIs see benefit in financial integration, economic cooperation
  - How important are their views in the political process?
US Financial Regulation and China

- Treatment of Chinese firms and FIs by US regulators
  - Financial regulation based on equal treatment, but concerns remain
- CFIUS
  - Has signaled negative attitude toward Chinese acquisitions, especially tech
  - Would that change under Biden administration?
- Sanctions and export controls:
  - Sanctioning of Huawei, WeChat, other firms and individuals has chilling effect
  - Trump administration has signaled likely increased use of sanctions
- Threats of delisting of Chinese firms
  - Effects on Chinese firms likely to be limited to smaller firms – ample liquidity in Shanghai, Shenzhen, HK
  - Effects on US could be larger and more lasting – loss of attractiveness of US markets, less convenience for US investors
  - Chinese accounting standards still problematic – how to protect US investors?
- Could overuse of financial sanctions lead to displacement of USD?
  - PBOC digital currency efforts may be reaction to US sanctions and threats
Chinese Financial Liberalization

- Strong commitment, driven by national interests
  - Desire to improve financial system
  - Need to effectively price equity, debt and commodity risk
  - Need to effectively manage Chinese savings
  - Need to recycle capital surpluses
  - Concerns about continued access to US financial markets

- Continued progress despite growing US-China tensions
  - Approval of foreign entrants in payments, mutual funds, etc.
  - Foreign access to more instruments and markets
  - State Council pledge to achieve full capital convertibility by 2030

- Will this be politically sustainable?
  - Has strong support from leadership
  - Economic slowdown or financial instability could create backlash
Is There a Path Forward?

• Bear in mind mutual interests
  – US-China relationship is complex and interdependent – decoupling would be painful for US, China, and world
  – US-China financial integration and openness benefit both sides

• Need to stick with the process
  – Establish joint, impartial investigation to better understand origins and responses to COVID-19 and derive lessons for future
  – Seek areas of cooperation – e.g., PCAOB auditing of US-listed Chinese firms
  – Keep communicating honestly and respectfully
  – Avoid “nuclear options” of financial sanctions, weaponizing USD, delisting, capital controls

• China and US must avoid a new Cold War
  – Need to create framework for competition and cooperation that doesn’t require the other side to sacrifice core interests
